

More Than Just a Job

Jeremy believes in giving back to the community. He was a board member of his community's nursery school and, for two years, ran the school's annual fundraising craft fair. He was also a classroom fixture as a parent volunteer. He initiated and sponsors his Read-It Club Program at Garrett Park Elementary School to help encourage and promote a love of reading. He actively supports the National Center for Children and Families, Common Hope, Children's Miracle Network, the Make-A-Wish Foundation, Ronald McDonald House Charities® of Greater Washington, and the Levine School of Music, among others. After all, it's about roots and community.

Early each weekday morning, as Jeremy Lichtenstein heads for a pre-dawn workout, he drives down the same tree-lined streets he once traveled by bicycle, in a small town called Garrett Park.

For Jeremy's two daughters, the start of a school day isn't about a carpool. It means a family walk to the same school Jeremy attended in his youth. The daily parade is led these days by a seven-year-old golden retriever named Oliver and a very rambunctious two-year-old rescued St. Bernard named Daisy.

The thread of community runs through everything about Jeremy. Emphasizing roots and grounding came quite naturally—and literally—for the two decades he owned and operated a successful landscaping business. During those years, Jeremy nourished a growing passion for real estate.

He purchased and remodeled a series of houses in Montgomery County, selling some and renting others. Later, Jeremy and his business partners built luxury homes in the metropolitan area. Southern Living magazine even featured a Garrett Park home Jeremy built for his young family.

A Complete Success

In 22 years as a top-producing real estate agent, Jeremy has brought together countless dozens of home buyers and sellers. He has also remained intimately involved with building projects, from the acquisition of property to design, marketing, and settlement. Jeremy's knowledge of construction—both of structures and communities—truly makes him indispensable. And he never wastes the most precious of commodities: time. Jeremy diligently pursues the goals of his profession, in order to better help buyers and sellers realize their home ownership dreams. After all, he says, if you can't enjoy your life and your life's work, too, why bother? Without a doubt, Jeremy knows the Washington area like the native that he is, with an all-encompassing perspective on the local market. To that résumé, he adds passion and insight, to help his clients reach their goals.

A Delicate Balance

Real estate agents never really get a day off. But at the end of each work day, Jeremy returns to community, to family dinners, to homework with the kids. For Jeremy, Saturday remains a family day. Bowling, shopping, or a lunch spot chosen each week by a different family member makes the day special. The family loves its vacations at Rehoboth Beach, combining the ocean, swimming pools, amusement parks, and indulgences in junk food. Coaching his daughter's soccer and basketball team is another way Jeremy stays involved with his family and community. Gardening, while no longer a profession, holds a special place in Jeremy's heart as his favorite way to unwind. He loves to stroll the aisles at local greenhouses, hunting for new exotic specimens to grace his yard, and talking shop with his fellow plant experts. He is well known as a neighborhood gardening consultant—and occasional critic. Call it professional research, too, for Jeremy's landscaping knowledge proves invaluable for builders siting locations for new home construction and for clients trying to envision potential.
